Big Little Problems

TU members expect to see bugs of all sorts in spider webs, on tree branches and under rocks but most of us don't think much about the danger that some of the little crawling beasts pose.

The hemlocks that grow near streams protect the banks from erosion, provide food for wildlife and are convenient perches for newly hatched insects. But, if an invasion of enemies from southern Japan is not stopped, the hemlocks will be no more. The invaders, wooly adelgids, can be found throughout the northeast – including my back yard – and have already destroyed 95% of the hemlocks in Virginia's Shenandoah national Park.

If you look closely at an evergreen and see tufts of a cotton-like substance at the base of the needles, you are looking at a tree that without help will die in a few years. The "cotton" is an adelgid egg sac. While the adelgids have no natural enemies except in Japan, local hemlocks have no natural defense against them; and, an adelgid can spawn 10,000 insects within a year, each of which will spend its life sucking the life from a tree.

The problem is that there are no large scale controls for adelgids. I have used insecticidal soap and oil sprays with moderate success and now use a systemic insecticide that is absorbed through the tree's roots. But these treatments cannot be used in the wild, so our hemlocks are in jeopardy.

Colchester kills bridge installation

By Patricia Breakey; Delhi News Bureau

The Colchester Town Board voted Dec. 2 against the installation of a $357,000 bridge on Horse Brook, a tributary of the Beaverkill, that was to be built at no cost to the town. The project was planned to allow the migration of three trout species to the spawning area above the existing culvert.

Colchester Supervisor Bob Homovich said the board opted not to approve the project because the cost of the project increased from $187,000 to $357,000, though the town's contribution didn't change. The bridge was originally planned with a 20-foot span, which would have resulted in the county taking ownership once it was completed. The final design shortened it to 16 feet, which meant the town would retain ownership and responsibility for upkeep and repair, Homovich added.

Theodore Gordon Flyfishers President Bert Darrow said, "It's terrible for the Colchester board to take

Big Newcomers

According to scientists at the New York State Museum, when wolves were wiped out in the eastern United States coyotes began to move in to fill the void. Those that now make their homes from Maine to New Jersey are larger and smarter than their western relatives because they have interbred with Canadian wolves.

The wolf derived coyotes are comfortable in forests unlike the western plains coyotes and they eat more deer. About a third of the diet of our local coyotes is made up of deer.

Hookless Fishing?

An article in the February issue of Outdoor Life magazine, entitled "Hookless Fishing", describes a catch and release method of fishing that was developed by New Jersey's Pat Moffitt (moffittangling.com).

In Moffitt's system a barbless circle hook is attached to the end of the leader and a fly is then attached to the line five or six inches above the hook.

When the angler feels a fish hit the fly he raises his rod. This tightens the line, pulling the leader through the fish's mouth until the fish is hooked in the corner of its jaw. As a result the fish cannot be deeply hooked and is more likely to survive. Moffitt also sells a wire hand tool that slides down the leader and disengages the hook almost instantly.

However, John Roetman sent a copy of an article from the January 1, 2010 issue of the Pennsylvania Outdoor News which warns that systems such as Moffitt's are illegal in Pennsylvania.

The Outdoor News article addresses

only trout beads but the description seems to be the same as Moffitt's: "The device works by attracting a fish to a salmon egg imitation on a line several inches above a hook. When the fish eats the bead and the angler jerks the line, the hook snares the fish on the outside of the jaw."

Later in the article Tom Tarkowski, of the Pennsylvania Fish and Boat Commission, is quoted as saying, "It's a legal device elsewhere, but illegal here. Trout beads hook fish on the outside of the mouth and, in Pennsylvania, any fish not hooked on the inside of the mouth has to be released."

After reading about Pennsylvania's law, however, we are left with a question. If Moffitt designed his system for catch and release, and Pennsylvania requires that fish that are hooked on the outside of the mouth be released, does Moffitt's system break any laws?

Pequest Open House

The New Jersey DEP's Division of Fish and wildlife will hold its annual Pequest Open House on Saturday and Sunday, March 27 and 28. Note: the dates in the 2010 Freshwater Fishing Digest are not correct.

This free event is usually held the week before the opening of trout season (April 10, 2010) but has been moved up a week to avoid conflicts with Easter weekend.

EJTU members will be at the Pequest to assist children who will be allowed to fish in the Education Pond or in the Kiddie Fishing Tank.

If you can help at this event, please contact Bob Hresko at (hreskor@gmail.com)

take away a gift like this from the town. The Beaverkill is a world-class trout stream, but the trout have been disappearing because they are losing spawning areas

Horse Brook

Rick Weidenbach, of the Soil and Water Conservation District, designed the project and helped obtain the funding and required permits.

Partial funding for the project was provided by Theodore Gordon Flyfishers, which secured money from the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Agency and Trout Unlimited. The largest portion of the funding came from the Upper Susquehanna Coalition, which received funds from the Millennium Pipeline Project.
